

The Connected Flow Blueprint

You built one engine in Week 2. This week you wire intake -> follow-up -> booking -> onboarding into ONE flow so a lead can travel from 'never heard of you' to 'onboarded client' without anything living in your head.

The full map

The three handoffs (this is the whole week)

- 1 INTAKE -> FOLLOW-UP: every lead source feeds ONE sheet. Form responses land automatically; calls and DMs you paste in within 24 hours. If it is not in the sheet, it does not exist.
- 2 FOLLOW-UP -> BOOKING: every touch email carries your booking link. When someone books, you (or a calendar-webhook later) flip their STATUS to BOOKED -- the engine stops touching them instantly.
- 3 BOOKING -> ONBOARDING: after the call, the deal is WON or DEAD. WON rows copy to the CLIENT TRACKER (or keep one sheet with two tabs) -- and the onboarding engine fires the welcome without you.

Your weekly 10-minute ritual (replaces hours of 'where was I?')

- ☐ Monday morning: open the sheet. Anything in NEW older than a day? The engine has it -- confirm LAST_TOUCH moved.
- ☐ Anything in BOOKED without a calendar event? Chase it now -- that's a lead leaking at the seam.
- ☐ Anything WON still showing in follow-up? Flip it. Two systems should never both own a person.
- ☐ Count: how many NEW this week vs last? That number is your practice's pulse. Write it down.

Common seams that leak (and the fix)

- Leads from referrals skip the form -> YOU are the intake. Paste them in same-day; the engine does the rest.
- Someone replies to Touch 2 with a question -> answer it, but STATUS stays T2 until they book. Replying is not booking.
- Client signs but you're traveling -> nothing breaks. That's the point. The welcome fires from the WON flip, not from you being at a desk.
